Scotland

Highlands

Highland whiskies possess a distinctive and compelling character. The distilleries here craft whiskies that showcase a vibrant and diverse landscape. Expect a blend of unexpected elements such as grassy notes, smoke, wax, tropical fruits, and currants. The whisky's profile can range from austere and restrained to rich and voluptuous, illustrating how contrasting qualities can come together harmoniously.

Oban, 14yo

43%

£10.50

A robust and fruity whisky with distinctive flavours of dried figs, honeyed spices, and a smoky malt dryness. It finishes long and smooth, with lingering notes of oak, dryness, and a hint of salt.

Speyside

Speyside has long been the heartland of malt whisky production and because of this it is easy to assume that it makes all fall within the same group. It's not so, Speyside is all about diversity, not commonality: there is no single Speyside style just as there is no uniform Speyside landscape.

Lowlands

The mindset of the Lowlands distiller has always been different to that of its Highland counterpart. The Lowlands became the undeniable capital of grain-whisky production, being the fastest — growing malt region in Scotland. Their whisky is large-scale, blended, and urban but now regaining its rural roots.

Islay

Islay's malts start life on the peat moss. Their aromas are the product of thousands of years of maceration, compression, decay, and transformation. You cannot escape peat on Islay. It is the DNA of its malts. Here the geographical terroir doesn't just speak, it roars.
